Nota Bene

Many of the above persons were arrested at one time or another, before October 1970, but this did not seemingly stop their enthusiasm when released. Rather, arrest seems to have been a badge of honour, which made them more careful, but more active. For example, Robert Hudon (L.F. at p.235), after imprisonment for his activities in 1963-4 in the l'Armée de libération du Québec (ARL), went on to form the Hudon cell, which was apparently responsible for "une trentaine de hold-ups de financement". Réjean

Tremblay and Jacques and ___ Désormeau were also “vétérans”. (L.F. at p. 235).

Jacques Lanctôt kidnapped James Cross after arrest.

It should also be understood that some radical groups of the period were sympathetic to the FLQ aims and purposes, although their members were not members of the FLQ. (See Chapter One). For example, Louis Fournier wrote: “Le ‘Mouvement pour la défense des prisonniers politiques québécois (MDPPQ)’, qui prend la relève du comité d’aide au groupe Vallières-Gagnon...” (Louis Fournier, at p. 485.) Jean-François Cardin also wrote:

Parmi les groupes qui ont eu le plus d’influence mentionnons le Mouvement de libération populaire (M.L.P.), né en juin 1965, et dont l’unique permanent n’est nul autre que Pierre Vallières, qui adhère au même moment au FLQ. En 1968, deux ans après la dissolution du M.L.P., une autre coalition des forces populaires et de gauche voit le jour, le Front de libération populaire (F.L.P.), issu de la frange socialiste radicale du défunt RIN. Le F.L.P., indépendantiste et socialiste, veut favoriser l’implantation de comités ouvriers combatifs et axe son action sur la propagande et la mise sur pied de nombreuses manifestations. C’est au sein d’organismes comme le M.L.P. et surtout le F.L.P. que militeront côte à côte des membres du FLQ et des syndicalistes de gauche.
